If the inscription on the monument to the Confederate dead at Hollywood is to be the Confederate dead at Hollywood is to be changed, as it ought to be, for the sake of changed, as it ought to be, for the sake of the changed, as it ought to be, for the sake of the changed, as it ought to be, for the sake of the changed, as it ought to be, for the sake of the changed, as it ought to be, for the sake of the changed in the lawer we'll rest, darling, side by side. No "the Confederate dead," let the inscription be in English, so the fathers, mothers, brothers, and sisters can read and understand. Let the inscription over the dead be in the tongue that cheered them on "to victory or to death." There are sweeter, dearer, prouder thoughts to the southern heart in many of Father Ryan's lines than can be found in all the dead languages combined. A. B.

To-night I kindred in his eastern home, he had resolved to purchase an agricultural or stock-raising estate in Texas, and there prosecute his remaining career. No sooner had he allowed this much of his confidence to gain public possession than every man in the county who had acres to sell-and a good many who did not-was at least his correspondent; and, after a week or two of leisurely retirement, he bought for some $5,000 a ranch on Chocolate Bayou. There, domesticating himself at once as what he termed a "gentleman farmer," he cordially reciprocated Nibilists. The wedding was fixed for an early day, and sumtuary and domiciliary preparations for it were nearly completed, when, to the horror of Chocolate society, the unspeakable anguish of the bride-elect, and the dismay of the presumptive bridegroom, the latter received the congratulations of a detective officer from Pinkerton's agency in Chicago, in whose company, after a brief interview, he departed hurriedly for the East as a prisoner of the law. This fact created not a great deal of sensation, for it was known to but few, the prisoner having been placed on board the cars at Highland station and hurried through. A News reparter, however, obtained the following particulars concerning the matter: It secems that some time since a certain wealthy oil company in Pennsylvania had its burglar-proof safe robbed of $17,500, and simultaneously one Norman Spencer, the previously immaculate bookkeeper of the concern, disappeared from his desk, boarding-house, and other familiar places. The coincidence permitted but one inference, and no one doubted that the missing man had been the robber, but to your bed-room? track and capture the fugitive were different things, and at first the plundered company almost gave up the task without a trial. A certain detective, however, aware that before his crime and flight Spencer had been devoted in his attentions to a young orphan girl in Titusville, decided to keep a strict watch on the young lady's move-ments, thinking that there would be some communication between them. Two months elapsed before the officer's vigilance found any reward; but at the end of that time, just after receiving a letter directed in backband" from St. Joseph, Mo., the lady suddenly departed for the West, followed and "shadowed," of course, by the detective. Through Pennsylvania and Ohio she journeyed on to Chicago, where, by the direction of his superiors at home, the officer enlisted the services of a noted young detective of that city to continue the "shadowing." From Chicago, under the surveillance of the new watcher, the lady went to Quincy. On reaching that city the lady went to a hotel, and the detective advised his employers of the state of the case. Instructions were sent to change officers, and a Quincy detective was put to work. Remaining at Quincy a day, the lady left one fine morning on the Hannibal and St. Joseph road. Her every motion had been watched, and the officer was on the to be the chief of Section 217, and I don't train with her. Up to this mement there had been no indication a Nimilist, too, Paulovna? that the lady had any idea that her motions were being watched. The sequel will show whether he was correct. The morning after her arrival at Kansas City the detective was seated at his breakfast when a woman exactly resembling the one he had been watching took her seat in the dining-room. She was closely veiled, but the height, figure, and dress were the same, and there could be no mistake about it. A few hours afterwards the train eastward came along, and the woman took her seat in one of the cars.
